PENERANGAN/INFORMATION :

1. Concept Of Honesty And Integrity

1.1 Introduction

- i) The majority of humans prefer peace over war and conflict, appreciate stability and value happiness, enjoyment and comfort. Generally, chaos and conflict, killings, instability and anarchy are viewed as negative factors and do not resonate well with the reasonable man.
- ii) Observing thousands of years of documented human history, it seems clear that mankind will always strive towards betterment and improvement of the quality of life. They built ships to sail to explore new lands and acquire wealth and riches. They created technologically and mechanically advanced equipment like compasses, telephones, computers and machinery to elevate their quality of life which constantly push the boundaries to higher levels. Every effort of mankind seems to suggest that when given a choice, mankind will always work towards making life easier.
- iii) Poverty is usually due to circumstances of life and very rarely out of choice. People generally do not choose to be poor but are in that situation due to circumstances beyond their control. When given a chance to improve their lives and acquire wealth, they rarely would choose to return to the state of being poor and under privileged. This proves that mankind generally shuns hardship and will pick wealth over poverty when given a choice. An ideal situation would be individuals who work towards wealth, comfort and happiness without compromising or abusing the rights and boundaries of others.
- iv) Therefore it is safe to say that our integrity will always be tested especially when we have to make decisions on what is fair, just and correct.

1.2 Definition

- i) Definition of Integrity
- ii) The Oxford Advanced Learner's Dictionary defines "integrity" as "the quality of being honest with strong moral principles". A person may possess personal, professional or artistic integrity.
- iii) The Macmillan Dictionary defines "integrity" as "The quality of always behaving according to the moral principles that you believe in, so that people respect and trust you" and "the quality of behaving according to the rules and standards of your job or profession".
- iv) From the above definitions, we may summarise that integrity denotes qualities of virtue, righteousness, goodness and morally good and correct behaviour. It also means obedience, cooperation, adherence and compliance.

1.2 Definition of Honesty

- i) The Oxford Advanced Learner's Dictionary defines "honesty" as "always telling the truth, never stealing or cheating".
- ii) The Macmillan Dictionary defines "honesty" as "a person who does not tell lies or cheat and obeys the law".

1.3 Integrity At The Workplace

- i) Integrity at the workplace is imperative for a healthy working environment. It does not matter what position one holds, whether it is the chief executive officer or the cleaner or the most junior staff, workplace integrity starts with honesty, dependability, trustworthiness and decency. Keeping to your word and being ethical and accountable in your actions creates respect and professionalism.
- ii) Examples of workplace integrity
- iii) Work when you are on the clock
Working diligently when you're on the clock is a clear example of workplace integrity. Socialising, surfing the Internet, making personal phone calls, texting and frequent snacking are activities that detract from work time. Saving those activities for break time will show your boss, co-workers and customers that you work hard when you're on the clock. Honour your work hours by not stealing time from your employer. Even if you don't actually clock in and out with a time card, focusing on your work responsibilities while you are at your desk, work station or production area will showcase your strong work habits.

iv) Follow company policies

Abiding by company policies is a powerful way to demonstrate integrity. Cutting corners and neglecting to follow workplace regulations can lead to mistakes, problems and even dangerous situations. Your willingness to properly record financial transactions, safely dispense of hazardous or toxic materials, follow company protocol for dealing with clients, perform clean-up or set-up procedures and properly maintain equipment shows others that you're not just looking for the easy way out. Establishing yourself as a trustworthy worker who submits to company policies shows your boss and co-workers that you'll faithfully carry out your duties.

v) Respect co-workers and build trust

Respecting those you work with reveals your desire to create a healthy work environment. Polite communication, appropriate interactions and respect for co-workers' thoughts and ideas demonstrate your ability to look beyond your own interests to pursue team-centered work goals. As you deal with co-workers honestly and respectfully, you establish a level of trust with them. According to Amy Rees Anderson, a contributor to Forbes magazine, those who trust you will spread the word of that trust to their associates, and word of your character will spread like wildfire.

vi) Exhibit responsible behaviour

Integrity in the workplace often stems from moral and ethical behavior. Making sure there is no reason to question your conduct is one of the best ways to prove that you are an honest and dependable employee. Avoid using company products or equipment for personal use and submit exact receipts for travel or meal reimbursements. Don't over-promise what you can't provide and strive to meet deadlines. Work productively and cooperate during company meetings so you don't appear lazy or apathetic, and don't call in sick if you aren't. By exhibiting responsible behavior, you don't give co-workers or clients the opportunity to question your integrity.

vii) The importance of integrity at the workplace

Integrity is the foundation of character. A person who has integrity has developed core virtues such as compassion, dependability, generosity, honesty, kindness, loyalty, maturity, objectivity and trust that will ultimately bring value and success to any organisation.

Working with people who have integrity creates a positive work environment because there is trust among co-workers and that will avoid insecurities, micro-management and suspicion.

2. Principles Of Confidentiality

2.1 Introduction

- i) In any organisation, there is often a lot of data or information being received, recorded, kept and processed in both hardcopy and digital formats. Handling such information and data with confidentiality is part of ethical behaviour and one of the principles of integrity.

2.2 Definition Of Confidentiality

- i) The Oxford Advanced Learner's Dictionary defines "confidentiality" as "Information or data which is to be kept secret or private and not to be told or shared with other people".

2.3 Categories Of Confidential Information

- i) Confidential workplace information can be broken down into 3 main categories:
 - a. Employee information
Some organisations have rules that govern confidentiality and disposal of 'personal indentifying information'. Employee information includes information such as social security numbers, home addresses, contact information, personal information, work history, medical history, family names, etc.
 - b. Management information
Confidential management information covers employee relations, disciplinary actions, investigation of misconduct, salary, remuneration, pay, overtime claims, impending lay-offs, etc. Disclosure of management information to unauthorised parties is unethical, counter-productive and creates damage and disharmony in the workplace.
 - c. Business information

---------------------------	--------------------------------	---

Confidential business information is sometimes known as "proprietary information" or "trade secrets" and refers to information not generally known to the public and would not ordinarily be available to competitors except through illegal or improper means. Examples of trade secrets include manufacturing process and methods, business plans, financial data, budgets and forecasts, computer programmes, clients' lists, ingredient formulas or recipes, supplier lists, etc.

2.4 The Importance Of Confidentiality In The Workplace

- i) Failure to properly secure and protect confidential business information can lead to loss of business and clients
- ii) Confidential information can be misused to commit illegal activity which may compromise parties eg. Fraud, cheating, forgery.
- iii) Disclosure of sensitive employee and management information can lead to a loss of employee trust, confidence and loyalty therefore resulting in a loss of productivity.

3. Workplace Confidentiality

3.1 Methods By Employers To Ensure Confidentiality In The Workplace

- i) Implement Confidentiality Policies and Procedures
- ii) Training of management and employees on confidentiality issues, policies and procedures
- iii) Enforcement of policies, procedures and training including disciplinary action
- iv) Non-Disclosure Agreement signed by employees to protect Business Information.

3.2 Methods By Employees To Practice Confidentiality In The Workplace

- i) Ensure you have undergone training on company policies and procedures
- ii) Ensure you understand the training
- iii) Refer to the policies and procedures on a regular basis
- iv) Adhere to the policies and procedures
- v) Suggest continuous improvements or offer constructive feedback to the management regarding the policies and procedures

4. Ethical Guidelines

4.1 Introduction

- i) Ethics refers to an external system of rules and law. There are rewards when the ethical guidelines are followed and adhered to and there is punishment when the rules are broken. An example of ethical guidelines are those drawn up by professional bodies for lawyers and doctors that monitor compliance and mete out the appropriate punishment or disciplinary action when the guidelines are breached.
- ii) Organisations often have a code of ethics which their employees are expected to obey.

4.2 How To Apply The Code Of Ethics

- i) Understand the Code of Ethics
- ii) Refer to the Code of Ethics on a regular basis
- iii) Adhere to the Code of Ethics
- iv) Suggest continuous improvement or constructive feedback.
