PENERANGAN/INFORMATION :

1. Leadership tasks and responsibilities

Effective performance management process that supports employee performance, development and success can only be achieved by involving everyone in the organization. Employees that being engaged and informed properly will ultimately produce result and higher participation rates plus better quality performance management. Information, instruction and job description must be clearly communicated to everyone. Here are the breakdown of task and responsibilities of each stakeholder group:

Executives and leaders, managers, employees and human resource executive or senior leader have to make sure that you are supportive of the process, communicate its value and engage others, you need to be an enthusiastic champion of the new process for others to participate. Sharing your support through a variety of employee communications vehicles are important and always be prepared to answer questions from various groups about “what's in it for me” to help build organizational commitment to the task and process.

1.1 Managers' tasks and responsibilities

Managers should play the role and have a responsibility to recognize and reinforce strong performance in your employees, identify and encourage improvement where needed. Viewing performance tasks and responsibilities in management as a two-way discussion that must go on throughout the year. Your employees should never be surprised by the ratings and feedback they receive in their formal performance reviews. Managers are expected to:

- i. Use the performance management process as a valuable tool for supporting employee development and improvement.
- ii. If your employees sense a lack of interest on your part, they'll lose interest too.
- iii. When talking with your team about the process, be sure to emphasize its benefits, and encourage employees to take ownership of their own performance and development.

- 1.2 Determine an appropriate schedule for regular performance conversations with those you manage directly.
  - i. Conduct short, regular meetings to discuss and record milestones, accomplishments, successes and challenges as they occur, when details are fresh in both your minds. This will allow you to better monitor progress on goals, and provide coaching as required. Plus, these short meetings reduce the effort it takes to prepare for and conduct your annual performance reviews because you have tracked progress and performance and provided the needed feedback when it was most valuable.
  - ii. Use the annual performance review meeting to review the achievements, setbacks, development and training that have already been discussed throughout the year and then use this information to establish goals and a development plan for the coming year.
- 1.3 Deliver regular, positive and constructive feedback.
  - i. Give employees feedback during one-on-one meetings and informal as regularly as possible.
  - ii. Commend your employee in front of their peers.
  - iii. Make performance notes about each employee in the period between conversations, so that come conversation time, you have concrete examples to share.
  - iv. Remember that the goal of feedback is to describe desired behaviors and expectations, not to dwell on undesirable behaviors.
- 1.4 Check-in on goal progress
  - i. Regularly check in with employees on their progress on goals; offer coaching or assistance, or revise goals as necessary.
- 1.5 Communicate and revisit performance expectations.
  - i. Communicate your organizations' performance standards and expectations to your employees. This will help your employees differentiate between acceptable and unacceptable behaviors and results and reduce any misunderstandings.
  - ii. Gather feedback on employee performance from multiple sources. Use a 360-degree feedback or survey tool to complete and validate your own observations and perceptions.
- 1.6 Improve your management and leadership skills.

- i. Take the time to learn how to be a better manager and coach. Invest in your own development!
- 1.7 Acquaint yourself with the different management needs of the different generations.
  - i. Employees from the Millennial-generation may have different needs and different expectations of managers. From the research managers require constant feedback and recognition, and expect quick career advancement. Workers from other generations have different needs. Learn what motivates each employee, and adjust your management approach accordingly.
- 1.8 Become a good coach to your employees in a way that strengthens two-way communication and reinforces desired behaviors.
  - i. Coach when you want to focus attention on a specific aspect of the employee's performance.
  - ii. Advise the employee ahead of time of issues you want to discuss.
  - iii. Focus on describing your expectations and the desired behaviors rather than describing the gaps.
  - iv. Take the time to understand why their performance is what it is, and get them to take ownership for performance improvements.
- 1.9 Support your employees' professional and career development while making them accountable for it.
  - i. Regularly ask employees about their career aspirations and help them identify areas they may wish to improve or develop, as well as resources available.
  - ii. Ensure each employee has a well-defined job description and understands the skills and competencies they must develop in order to progress up the career ladder.
  - iii. Give your employees the time and flexibility they need to complete learning and development activities.
  - iv. Ensure development is having an impact on performance.
- 1.10 Submit your completed employee reviews by the designated deadline.
  - i. Failing to complete your formal performance review documentation on time sends your employees the message that recognition of their success and support for their development is not your top priority. It may also

4. Flexibility in work practice

"Flexibility is about an employee and an employer making changes to when, where and how a person will work to better meet individual and business needs. Flexibility enables both individual and business needs to be met through making changes to the time (when), location (where) and manner (how) in which an employee works. Flexibility should be mutually beneficial to both the employer and employee and result in superior outcomes."

4.1 Formal flexibility

Formal flexibility are policies that are officially approved human resources policies, as well as any official policies that give supervisors discretion to provide flexibility."

4.2 Informal flexibility

Informal flexibility refers to "policies that are not official and not written down but are still available to some employees, even on a discretionary basis." While most formal work arrangements can usually be identified, organizations acknowledge that utilization statistics probably under estimate the true reach and impact of flexibility, as they cannot accurately determine the extent of informal flexibility, for example, employees who occasionally alter their work hours or work from home.

Human resources professionals have embraced it and while many are adapting their office to accommodate the wants and needs of employees, few really know how to put a successful flexible workplace program into place. Some big-name companies have moved away from flexible procedures, while others completely ignore the pursuit of something they view as unattainable. But, when correct deployment of workplace flexibility can be the competitive factor that attracts, retains the top talent and also can help boost company productivity. It just takes time, effort and the occasional trial and error.

Companies of all sizes can learn how to introduce and master a productive, flexible work environment in their offices. There are many formulas that work seamlessly for employees and management alike, and many others that won't work. Everyone assumes there are pitfalls to going flexible and they're right. Overcoming them is possible and can make a company stronger.
