PENERANGAN / INFORMATION :

1. Expectation

There will be great challenge in serving the clients at workplace. In order to achieve the client satisfaction trainees are expected to come out with suggestions on how to improve and handle the shortages.

2. Client Expectations

Client expectation refers to the total perceived benefits a customer expects from a company's product or service. If the actual experience customers have with a product exceeds the expectation, they are typically satisfied. If the actual performance falls below the expectation, they are typically disappointed.

2.1 Identifying Client Expectations

Because customer expectations are an ever-evolving process, it can be very challenging to know precisely what those expectations might be. The best course of action is to take the question directly to the customer base through a variety of customer service research techniques.

For example, have customers' complete surveys about the products and service. Provide incentive for them to complete that survey, such as entry into a drawing for an enticing prize. Next time you see a customer, ask if his expectations of the business are being met. If not, find out why and what you can do to make the service better.

To identify client expectations, check written documents, and initiate through management to have a dialogue with the client to uncover unwritten expectations by asking questions and listening. Manage increasing expectations by reminding the staff and client of the original objectives.

The stated corporate values are determined by going through written documents and check actions related to those stated values to see which ones are the basis for action. Attempt to avoid conflicts of values by identifying the differences before they become problems.

Do not take advantage of clients' mistakes; instead help them meet their objectives in spite of their errors. Live your own values of fairness.

2.2 Common Expectations to Consider

Some of the most common and basic expectations customers have for most businesses include:

- i) Fast, efficient and accurate service
- ii) High quality products at a competitive price
- iii) Friendly, helpful service staff to provide information and answer questions
- iv) Prompt responses to their inquiries, whether online, by phone or in person
- v) Sufficient stock to meet their needs without long waits
- vi) A trained staff that can handle their questions without referring them on
- vii) A clean facility or easy to navigate website

All of these expectations comprise the minimum of what the top-notch service should look like. Additional expectations may arise from the customer research, which one can address on an individual basis.

2.3 Benefits of Meeting Expectations

When one is able to accurately identify and adequately meet his clients' expectations, his customer service reputation will automatically be enhanced.

Some of the benefits of meeting the clients' expectations include:

---------------------------------	--------------------------------	--

- i) Customers that transform from first-time visitors to loyal clients
- ii) Increased sales as customers feel more comfortable doing business with one
- iii) More referrals from satisfied customers who bring in additional business by word of mouth

2.4 Tools to meet the client expectations include

- i) Knowing the customers' needs
- ii) Setting customer expectations
- iii) Meeting customer expectations
- iv) Fixing and resetting expectations

2.4.1 Knowing the customers' needs

Knowing customer needs is at the centre of every successful business, whether it sells directly to individuals or other businesses. Once you have this knowledge, you can use it to persuade potential and existing customers that buying from you is in their best interests. The more you know about your customers, the more effective your sales and marketing efforts will be. It's well worth making the effort to find out:

- i) who they are
- ii) what they buy
- iii) why they buy it

2.4.2 Setting customer expectations

Right from the first contact you have with a customer it's important to set expectations. Too many times I've talked to customers where they've had sales guys over promise and set expectations so high that their poor account managers had no chance of meeting them.

Once you know your customer needs, you can begin setting expectations. Here you can tell customers what service levels they can expect to receive, what support is available to them, what results they should be getting and what KPI's you'll be working towards. Every industry and even every customer might have a different set of expectations. This are because there different needs to be adjusted accordingly.

2.4.3 Meeting customer expectations

Meeting customer expectations is the most valuable part of customer satisfaction. A satisfied customer is one that has had their expectations met. To do this, you must make sure you deliver a consistent level of service that is based on the key areas and KPI you have set for each customer when you set expectations.

2.4.4 Fixing and resetting expectations

From time to time you are going to fail to meet customers' expectations. It's the nature of the beast. There are a number of reasons why this might happen from poor customer service, under-trained staff, expectations set incorrectly, or even growing pains where expectations have changed.

The key word is how, you go about acknowledging you have stuffed up and how you put systems in place to fix and reset customer expectations. Immediately after finding out that you've failed to meet customers expectations is to call them. Get the complete picture of what's going on and try to tee up a face to face meeting.

3 Product and Service Providers Capability

Product or service quality is the ability of business to design, develop and deliver product or service that meets or exceeds customer expectations. Customers expect certain things when they walk into a business, and those with the highest level of service will know how to identify those expectations and meet them to the customer's satisfaction.

The quality of the customer service is almost wholly determined by the ability to meet the client expectations. One can have the greatest service team, but if the customers perceive their needs are not being met, the service reputation suffers.

By the same token, companies that don't spend much time worrying about customer service – but manage to meet customer expectations consistently – are perceived as offering good customer service.

Product or service quality is largely determined by customer's perception, that is why meeting client expectations is an essential part of the process. The product or service orientation; implies a desire to identify and serve customers/clients, who may include the public, colleagues, partners (e.g. educational institutes, non-government organizations, etc.), co-workers, peers, branches, ministries/agencies and other government organizations. It means focusing one's efforts on discovering and meeting the needs of the customers/clients involves many levels:

- i) Follow Up.
- ii) Maintain Clear Communication.
- iii) Take Personal Responsibility.
- iv) Take Action for the Customer/Client.
- v) Address Underlying Customer/Client Needs
- vi) Use a Long-Term Perspective

The important strategies for enhanced quality products or services are:

- i) seek improvements to delivering quality services;
- ii) increase their satisfaction with the service rendered;
- iii) better understand their needs for and expectations of the services you provide;
- iv) help them understand the services you provide;
- v) manage their expectations where these exceed the organization's limitations or mandate;
- vi) accommodate their desire to be consulted about the services they receive.

4. Client Satisfaction

Customer satisfaction is a term frequently used in marketing. It is a measure of how products and services supplied by a company meet or surpass customer expectation. Customer satisfaction is defined as "the number of customers, or percentage of total customers, whose reported experience with a firm, its products, or its services (ratings) exceeds specified satisfaction goals. It is seen as a key performance indicator within business and is often part of a Balanced Scorecard.

Customer expectations are a dynamic feature that ebbs and flows regularly in accordance with a wide range of factors. However, when expectations are not met by the performance of the customer service representatives, customer dissatisfaction is the result.

$$\text{Client Expectations} + \text{Service Performance} = \text{Client Satisfaction}$$

Client satisfaction is a result of the service level one deliver compared to what the client expects to receive. Two of the sources of dissatisfaction in personal and business interactions are unmet expectations and a misunderstanding or ignorance of the values held by the other party. The supervisor must avoid having a dissatisfied client due to a clash of values or a failure to meet expectations, as it can result in unhappiness.

4.1 Tools to avoid having dissatisfied client include

i) Understanding client expectations

Excellent customer service and high customer satisfaction must start with understanding customer expectations. You need to know who your customers are and what they want. When measuring customer satisfaction, companies generally ask customers whether their product or service has met or exceeded expectations. This is an important question to ask and is a key factor behind satisfaction

Benefits that can be obtained from understanding client expectations:

- a) It lets one know what service levels are expected to keep customers happy and achieve high client satisfaction
- b) It enables employees to focus on fulfilling clients' expectations
- c) It gives one the opportunity to exceed expectations and create raving advocates
- d) It can help one resolve customer complaints. Since complaints are a result of failing to meeting expectations, one have the ability to quickly fix the problems and retain the business

ii) Clarify values and determine the differences

Values are desirable principles or qualities. Disagreements based on differences in values are extremely difficult to resolve because compromising means conciliation your values. Organizations often have developed a list of corporate values. Sometimes these are real and sometimes they are more important to the corporate brand. The supervisor needs to understand the real organizational and personal values related to his/her job scope and objective.

iii) Describe the importance of dealing fairly with the client

During the provision of a service or handling a task involving identified client, the organization will often have the opportunity to take advantage of the client. In most cases, the client wants to be treated fairly. Fairness is characterized by impartiality and honesty that is free from self-interest, prejudice, or favoritism. If the client interprets the deal as fair, then the organization or supervisor has the opportunity to create a satisfied client. If the client believes the behavior of the supervisor is unfair, then it is difficult to create a satisfied client.
