PENERANGAN/INFORMATION :

1. Common work practices.

1.1 Common work practices cover a diverse landscape of ethics, some with legal implications, all of which the staff must be aware. Company policies and mission, employer demeanor and actions provide a working template for employees to use as they conduct their day-to-day business. Develop a template for an ethical workplace culture by defining what constitutes ethical practices. Business values and ethics policies guide employee ethical practices.

1.2 Justice Practices

The Golden Rule is a succinct guide for just practices in the workplace. The manager can collaborate with staff in defining what constitutes justice. Apply that definition to every sector and situation in a small business operation. Criteria for justice applies to all people and all situations, according to Charles D. Kerns in "Creating and Sustaining an Ethical Workplace Culture." Employees put ethical guidance for justice on the job into practice by treating each other and all clients and customers fairly and equally. Anti-discrimination laws are examples of just employee practices.

1.3 Integrity Practices

Integrity requires the courage to do what is right despite popular opinion. Employees who practice integrity in the workplace support what is morally right and what the business represents to its staff and to its customer base. Members of a sales staff, for example, truthfully represent a product line or services. They keep their word to their clients because it is the right thing to do and because their word is the company's word. Integrity requires consistent practice.

1.4 Confidentiality and Privacy Practices

Confidentiality and privacy laws and practices play a role in every business. A healthy work culture displays respect for employee privacy. Employees practice confidentiality by refraining from gossip about colleagues' private issues. Employees of small healthcare businesses abide by privacy laws as a matter of daily operations.

1.5 Self-Control Practices

When challenging situations arise, employees who can control their emotions and actions exhibit ethical behavior in the workplace. Self-control prevents difficult situations from escalating into conflicts that disrupt workflow and threaten staff morale. Employees with self-control and discipline may strive to stay on top of their workload. When they avoid backlogs, they help their colleagues to maintain a steady work pace and they contribute to the overall productivity of the business.

2. Respect and trust of others.

2.1 Respect and trust are two different words that often go hand-in-hand. For a person to trust someone you need to respect them, while respecting someone also demands for trusting them. The second statement isn't always true as many you can look to up to many people but not trust them. That all boils down to the definition of trust, which basically means having faith that the person will do what is best for the person that is trusting. However, in some cases one may respect many people but that does not mean that the person is looking to do what is best for the individual.

2.2 Trust has a deeper meaning when it comes to using it in relationships. Trust would actually mean that a person places complete confidence and in another person. The person believes that the person he/she is trusting will not harm them in any way and will always look out for them. Trust is a permanent concept, where a person that is trusted is usually trusted for life, until that person breaks that trust. If either party breaks the trust, it takes a long time to build it back.

2.3 Respect is a term that defines the feeling of holding an entity or person in a high esteem, or valuing their opinions greatly. Basically, respecting someone is looking up to that person and believing that he/she is something great. Respect requires the person to garner a feeling of awe for the person that he/she respects. They hold that particular person, nation, group, organization, religion, etc. in the highest standards. They believe that the entity is worth listening to or that they can do no wrong. Respect is considered to be a concept that must be earned and is considered to be one of the hardest things to earn. It requires the person to do something great or be someone great. It is also considered as a give and take feeling, where in order to earn respect a person must also take respect.

3. Cultural sensitivity and multiplicity.

3.1 Definition of cultural sensitivity is the awareness and sensitivity of other practices and cultures. Cultural sensitivity skills can include assessing different cultures, how they should be properly approached and how to communicate accordingly. Skills may also include evaluating how certain cultural differences can affect how people work, and how to value differences so that discrimination and harassment, either intended or not, do not occur.

3.2 Cultural multiplicity is the quality of diverse or different cultures, as opposed to monoculture, as in the global monoculture, or a homogenization of cultures, akin to cultural decay. The phrase cultural multiplicity can also refer to having different cultures respect each other's differences. The phrase "cultural multiplicity" is also sometimes used to mean the variety of human societies or cultures in a specific region, or in the world as a whole. The culturally destructive action of globalization is often said to have a negative effect on the world's cultural diversity.

3.3 The importance of cultural sensitivity.

Cultural sensitivity skills are important for your employees to function cohesively as a team that is respectful and courteous to each other regardless of cultural differences. Also, cultural sensitivity skills may be important for certain employees who regularly interact with outside business clients, many of whom may have diverse backgrounds and heritages.

3.4 Types of cultural sensitivity skills.

Cultural sensitivity skills can encompass a wide array of abilities, depending on the diversity of your employees and clientele and how culturally sensitive you want employees to be. Typically, though, these skills may include an ability to at least build a functioning professional relationship with others, communicate in a respectful and polite manner according to which culture you are conversing with, and possess an ability to overlook cultural boundaries and interact on a regular basis for the good of the company. For example, in some cultures it is considered customary to greet one another with a hug. If you are doing business in a culture such as this and you greet your business client with a handshake instead of a hug, your client may be offended.

3.5 Implementation of cultural sensitivity and multiplicity.

One can never learn everything about another culture; however, there are practical, everyday steps we can take to develop our cultural awareness. Here are some suggestions:

- i) Develop awareness: take a look at your own biases and prejudices, become aware of cultural norms, attitudes, and beliefs, and value diversity;
- ii) Don't allow cultural differences (preferences) to become the basis for criticism and judgements. Differences are neither good nor bad – it is what we do with them that makes a difference;
- iii) Build friendships of mutual respect and a desire for understanding;
- iv) Be yourself and show that you care about the person and that you honestly want to help;
- v) Take time to listen. If you don't understand, or you are not being understood, take the time to find out why. Explain or ask questions. For example, "Would you help me understand?"
- vi) Acquire knowledge about other cultures by attending classes or seminars, reading books or watching movies about other cultures, and attending cultural events/festivals.

3.6 Developing a culturally competent attitude is an ongoing process. It is important to view all people as unique individuals and realize that their experiences, beliefs, values and language affect their ways of interacting with others and the larger community. Also, be aware that differences also exist within cultures. It is wrong to assume that a common culture is shared by all members of a racial, linguistic or religious group.
