PENERANGAN / INFORMATION:

1. DEFINING DELEGATION

Delegation is not a task assignment. You're not simply assigning work to employees that falls within their job duties and responsibilities. To delegate, you must give someone the responsibility and authority to do something that's normally part of your job.

Delegation is not "dumping." If employees think you're merely throwing unpleasant assignments on their lap, they'll resent having to find extra time for boring or dead-end projects.

Delegation is not abdication. You share accountability for the assignment. That's why you must establish appropriate controls and checkpoints to monitor your employees' progress.

Your role is to set clear goals and expectations for the assignment — including any boundaries or criteria — without telling the worker how to do it. This way, you allow others to discover for themselves the best way to follow through.

Delegation involves three elements:

- responsibility
- authority
- accountability

When you delegate, you distribute responsibility and authority to others while holding them accountable for their performance. The ultimate accountability, however, still lies with you.

2. LEARNING TO DELEGATE

‘The most difficult thing in the world is to know how to do a thing and to watch somebody else doing it wrong, without comment.’ – TH White

‘It is never a sign of weakness when a man in a high position delegates authority; on the contrary, it is sign of his strength and of his capacity to deserve success.’ – Walter Lippman

Most people vow that when they become a manager they will become good delegators. However, when they reach the giddy heights of management they too often fail to carry out the promise. Why is that so many managers are reluctant to delegate even the simplest of task? With few exceptions, the reason is purely psychological, as illustrated by the following list:

NO. KOD / CODE NO.	Z-009-4:2015-M01/P(3/7)	Mukasurat / Page : 3 Drpd / Of : 19
---------------------------	--------------------------------	--

- Assumed lack of ability of subordinates – until you make yourself aware of strengths and weakness of your staff, it is natural to assume that they lack the necessary skills.
- ‘It’s quicker to do it myself” - in the short term, yes, but not in the long term. If a task takes you in one hour each week, you could save yourself 45 to 50 hours a year by delegating it to someone else.
- The manager enjoys the task – until his recent retirement, the chairman and founder of a haulage company in the south east of England always prepared the holiday schedule for his 230 employees. Despite the attempts of his fellow directors, she could not be persuaded to delegate this comparatively simple task. He enjoys doing it.
- The manager has always done it – why? Is not to know the time for a change?
- Reluctance to share knowledge – after all, knowledge is power
- Ego – The manager comes to be considered to be martyr and to be seen to be overworked
- Fear – Fear that the person who takes on the task may do it better than the manager; fear that the staff may feel that is too demeaning for them. Fear to unknown
- Over protective of staff – not wishing to appear to be overloading the staff with work.
- Politics – The top management would not approve
- Lack of communications skills – not knowing how to delegate

Delegation involves passing responsibility for completion of work to other people. This section examines the reasons you should delegate, how to delegate, failure to delegate and what should not be delegated.

3. UNDERSTANDING WHY DELEGATION IS IMPORTANT

Good delegation will give many benefits to you as the manager and to your staff. Good delegation will provide:

- More time in which to manage
- Valuable development for staff
- A mean of motivating staff
- More staff job satisfaction
- A Sense of responsibilities for staff
- A good working environment

NO. KOD / CODE NO.	Z-009-4:2015-M01/P(3/7)	Mukasurat / Page : 4 Drpd / Of : 19
---------------------------	--------------------------------	--

- More staff involvement

3.1 Delegation is useful for the following reasons:

- Once people have learned how to work with you, they can take responsibility for jobs you do not have time to do.
- You can develop people to look after routine tasks that are not cost-effective for you to carry out
- It transfers work to people whose skills in a particular area are better than yours, saving time.
- Transfer of responsibility develops your staff, and can increase their enjoyment of their jobs

4. KNOWING HOW TO DELEGATE

Good delegation will be highly motivating to all concerned, while poor delegation will be very demotivating. To delegate effectively, follow this sequence of simple steps:

- Decide the task to be delegated. Preferably it should be a continuing task, not a 'one-off'.
- Select the most appropriate member of your staff to delegate to. This will largely depend upon the task.
- Check the existing workload of that staff member. You will not be thank if they think that you are dumping extra work on them. It may be necessary to delegate some of their work to somebody else.
- Discuss your proposals with the person you have selected. Explain the task, its importance and why you have chosen them. Get their agreement to take on the job.
- Train the person until you are both happy that they can do the task
- Establish and agree a monitoring procedure
- Assign the necessary authority and responsibility with the task.
- The amount of delegation by a manager should be a balance between dictatorship and abdication
- Accountability should always go with responsibility
- Let go the reins when the time is right

---------------------------	--------------------------------	--

4.1 The following points may help you in delegating jobs:

i) Deciding what to delegate

One way of deciding what to delegate is simply to list the things that you do which could be more effectively done by someone either more skilled in a particular area, or less expensive. Alternatively you may decide to use your activity log as the basis of your decision to delegate: this will show you where you are spending large amounts of time on low yield jobs.

ii) Select capable, willing people to carry out jobs:

How far you can delegate jobs will depend on the ability, experience and reliability of your assistants. Good people will be able to carry out large jobs with no intervention from you. Inexperienced or unreliable people will need close supervision to get a job done to the correct standard. However if you coach, encourage and give practice to them you may improve their ability to carry out larger and larger tasks unsupervised.

iii) Delegate complete jobs:

It is much more satisfying to work on a single task than on many fragments of the task. If you delegate a complete task to a capable assistant, you are also more likely to receive a more elegant, tightly integrated solution.

iv) Explain why the job is done, and what results are expected:

When you delegate a job, explain how it fits into the overall picture of what you are trying to achieve. Ensure that you communicate effectively:

- the results that are needed
- the importance of the job
- the constraints within which it should be carried out
- the deadlines for completion
- internal reporting dates when you want information on the progress of the project

v) Then let go!

Once you have decided to delegate a task, let your assistant get on with it. Review the project on the agreed reporting dates, but do not constantly look over their shoulders. Recognize that your assistants may know a better way of doing something than you do. Accept that there may be different ways of achieving a particular task, and also that one of the best ways of really learning something is through making mistakes. Always accept mistakes that are not caused by idleness, and that are learned from.

---------------------------	--------------------------------	--

vi) Give help and coach when requested:

It is important to support your subordinates when they are having difficulties, but do not do the job for them. If you do, then they will not develop the confidence to do the job themselves.

vii) Accept only finished work:

You have delegated a task to take a work load off you. If you accept only partially completed jobs back, then you will have to invest time in completing them, and your assistant will not get the experience he or she needs in completing projects.

4.2 Why do people fail to delegate?

Despite the many advantages of delegation, some managers do not delegate.

This can be for the following reasons:

i) Lack of time:

Delegating jobs does take time. In the early stages of taking over a job you may need to invest time in training people to take over tasks. Jobs may take longer to achieve with delegation than they do for you to do by yourself, when coaching and checking are taken into account. In time, with the right people, you will find that the time taken up reduces significantly as your coaching investment pays back.

ii) Perfectionism - fear of mistakes:

Just as you have to develop staff to do jobs quickly without your involvement, you will have to let people make mistakes, and help them to correct them. Most people will, with time, learn to do jobs properly.

iii) Enjoying 'getting my hands dirty':

By doing jobs yourself you will probably get them done effectively. If, however, your assistants are standing idle while you do this, then your department will be seriously inefficient. Bear in mind the cost of your time and the cost of your department's time when you are tempted to do a job yourself.

---------------------------	--------------------------------	--

iv) Fear of surrendering authority:

Whenever you delegate, you surrender some element of authority (but not of responsibility!) This is inevitable. By effective delegation, however, you get the benefits of adequate time to do YOUR job really well.

v) Fear of becoming invisible:

Where your department is running smoothly with all routine work effectively delegated, it may appear that you have nothing to do. Now you have the time to think and plan and improve operations (and plan your next career step!)

vi) Belief that staff 'are not up to the job':

Good people will often under-perform if they are bored. Delegation will often bring the best out of them. People who are not so good will not be effective unless you invest time in them. Even incompetent people can be effective, providing they find their level. The only people who cannot be reliably delegated to are those whose opinions of their own abilities are so inflated that they will not co-operate.

It is common for people who are newly promoted to managerial positions to have difficulty delegating. Often they will have been promoted because they were good at what they were doing. This brings the temptation to continue trying to do their previous job, rather than developing their new subordinates to do the job well.

4.3 What should not be delegated?

While you should delegate as many tasks as possible that are not cost effective for you to carry out, ensure that you do not delegate the control of your team. Remember that you bear ultimate responsibility for the success or failure of what you are trying to achieve.

Effective delegation involves achieving the correct balance between effective control of work and letting people get on with jobs in their own way

5. Deciding What To Delegate

One of the problem facing managers when it comes to delegation is knowing what and what not to delegate. As a rule of thumb, you should able to delegate the following:

- Project that expand the capabilities of the individual, e.g. preparation of statistical data, restructuring departmental workflows, recommendations for future activities.
- Complete task with responsibilities. Giving only part of job will provide no sense of achievement.
- Closed decision with clear cut criteria.

5.1 On the other hand, task that should not be delegate include:

- i) Management prerogatives and key tasks : e.g. salary review, departmental objectives, confidential or sensitive task.
- ii) Part task with no overall responsibility
- iii) Only boring, mundane, routine task

5.2 The following are a list of tasks that could be delegated to staff

- i) The recruitment of a new member of staff
- ii) A project in an area in which you are particularly competent
- iii) The preparation of forecast of budgets
- iv) Recommendations for future changes
- v) Employee disciplinary procedures
- vi) Routine work

6. THE PROCESS OF DELEGATION

6.1 Step 1: Choose What to Delegate

Study what kind of job you intend to delegate. Plan how you are going to present the assignment, including your requirements, parameters, authority level, checkpoints, and expectations.

To determine what tasks you should delegate, begin by keeping a log of what you do during the day. After two weeks, review your daily activity log and ask yourself if it truly reflects what you should be doing.

Say you make the most contribution to your firm by focusing on five duties:

- Courting new customers
- Mapping out your firm's growth strategy
- Exploring acquisitions and marketing alliances
- Analyzing new markets for your products or services
- Coaching employees

If your activity log shows you do not spend the bulk of your time in these five areas, this should spur you to delegate. Squandering your day on minor matters will divert you from what really counts and stymie your company's growth.

---------------------------	--------------------------------	---

- i) Do delegate:
 - All routine or even sporadic clerical duties (filing, counting, sorting, routine reports)
 - Making minor decisions
 - Answering routine questions
 - Minor staffing problems such as scheduling
 - Anything your employees are expected to do when you're not there
 - Jobs that can develop the employee in other areas for potential promotion
- ii) Don't delegate:
 - An emergency or short-term task where there's not time to explain or train
 - Morale problems
 - A presentation to investors about your company's financial performance and future plans
 - A job no one else in the company is qualified to do
 - Personnel issues such as hiring, firing or disciplinary matters

6.2 Step 2: Choose the Right Person to Delegate to

Andrew Carnegie once said, "The secret of success is not in doing your own work but in recognizing the right man to do it."

The key to finding the right person to delegate to is to match skills and personality to the task at hand. As a preliminary exercise, ask each of your employees these questions:

- What would you like to learn more about at this company?
- What areas would you like to expand your skills?
- What parts of this company do you feel you know the most/least about?
- Are you eager to change your current job duties in any way? If so, how?

Armed with the answers, you can delegate duties to people who are receptive to accepting them.

Also consider the work habits of individuals on your team. Some people may need lots of explanation, while others merely want to know your expectations and any guidelines before they're left alone to "get it done."

6.3 Step 3: Communicate What You Want Done

Rather than rush to give "do this, do that" orders, effective delegation consists of explaining the WHAT and the WHY:

WHAT do you want the employee to do?

WHY did you choose them to do it?

When you delegate, include a "WHAT-WHY statement." Examples:

I'd like you to make ten survey calls to find out what our customers think of our new product. Given your excellent phone manner, I think you would represent us well and get people talking.

We need to turn in some financial information to state regulators by next Friday, and I want you to confirm all the numbers are up-to-date and accurate in our financial exhibits. You're a stickler for details, so I'm depending on you to crosscheck everything.

Can you write a letter to our suppliers about our new purchasing policies? You're familiar with our expense control measures and you're a good writer, so I think you would be perfect to write this letter and provide the proper context.

6.4 Step 4: Follow Up

Establish checkpoints to monitor progress. This discussion should be a collaborative process where you reach mutual agreement on how you intend to follow up.

You have three options to track an employee's work:

- Scrutinize and approve every step of the assignment before the worker proceeds to the next stage.

Pro: You ensure the project is completed satisfactorily, and you can satisfy your urge to know what's going on throughout the process. Many control-oriented entrepreneurs prefer to keep a close watch on an assignment after they delegate it, especially if it involves lots of details or complicated steps.

---------------------------	--------------------------------	---

Con: You might make the employee feel stupid by signing off on each step. You risk showing you don't trust others to think for themselves without your constant oversight. Plus, it takes more of your time.

- Set a date for the individual to complete the work. Instruct the employee to come to you with any questions along the way; otherwise, you stay out of it.

Pro: You give the worker a chance to operate independently without lots of interference. Your hands-off role also frees you to do what's most important.

Con: You may be in for an unpleasant surprise if the work isn't done by the due date or it's done incorrectly, and you may have no way of knowing how it's going unless the employee chooses to keep you informed.

- Designate a manager who's in charge of overseeing the employee's work. This is really double delegation: you're assigning work to someone and assigning a supervisor to monitor that work.

Pro: You increase the odds the work will get done properly — without having to spend time tracking it yourself. You can also give your team leaders a chance to expand their supervisory role by making them the "contact person" for your employee and by having them follow the worker's progress.

Con: In a fast-growing business, you may not have the luxury of putting a manager in charge of monitoring an employee's work. And that manager may not have the time to track the project carefully or provide meaningful help to the employee.

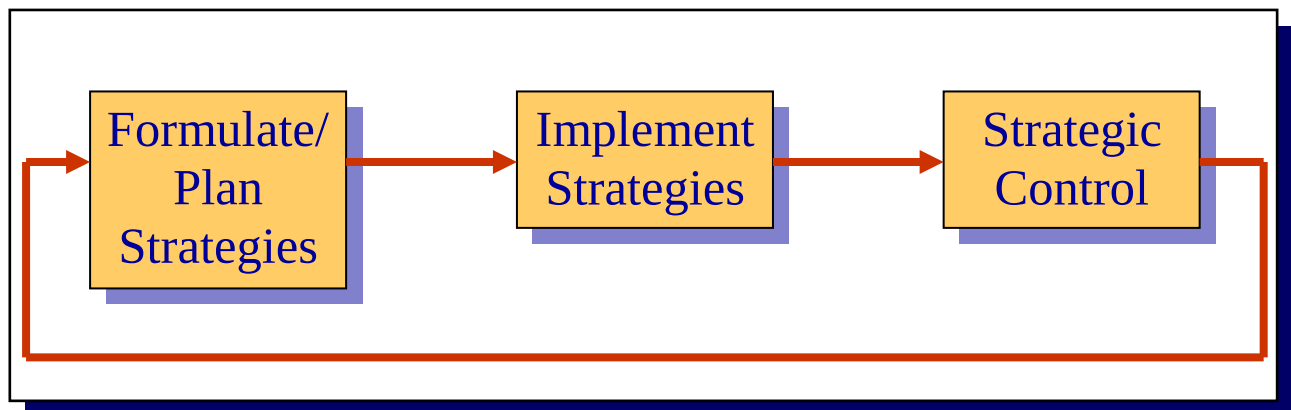

7. Monitoring System

After delegating tasks, we must ensure that the work is done accordingly. Therefore, we must develop and maintain a certain monitoring system to monitor and control the work being delegated to other staff.

- The value of effective strategic control systems
- The key difference between “traditional” and “contemporary” control systems
- The imperative for “contemporary” control systems in many of today’s complex and rapidly changing environments

7.2 Effective Reward Systems

- Objectives are clear, understood, agreed upon
- Objectives are “stretch” level of difficulty, specific, measurable, and within a timeframe
- Rewards are linked to performance AND desired behaviors (ends AND means)
- Performance measures are clear and visible
- Feedback is prompt and clear
- The system is fair and equitable
- The system is flexible and adjustable

7.3 Effective Boundaries and Constraints

- Focus individual efforts on strategic priorities
- Translate long-term objectives into short-term objectives
- Create action plans to channel efforts and denote accountabilities
- Improve efficiency and effectiveness

i) Work to minimize improper and unethical conduct

Effective delegation is an important tool that some managers hesitate to use. This may result from inexperience with delegation particularly for a novice manager, a reluctance to release work one personally enjoys doing, or even an adherence to the old adage, "If you want something done right, do it yourself." Here are eight basic guidelines to help you delegate more effectively:

ii) Determine what you will delegate. You decide which task(s) you want to delegate. Keep in mind that delegating is different from simply assigning someone a task that is already a part of the normal job requirements. When you delegate, you give someone else one of your job tasks; but you maintain control and responsibility.

- iii) Clarify the results you want. Determine the results you consider necessary for successful completion of the task. In general, the employee to whom you delegate uses his or her own methods to accomplish the task. If you expect use of a specific method to accomplish results, relate that to the employee at the beginning.
- iv) Clearly define the employee's responsibility. You, not the employee, determine the level of responsibility. Be sure the employee understands that level. After you have given the employee the information about the delegated task, ask him to tell you his understanding of both the task and goals. If the employee's answers do not match your expectations, review the matter in detail again.
- v) Communicate the employee's authority over the delegated task. Define the scope and degree of authority given to the employee for the delegated task. Explain which decisions he or she may make independently and which require your approval. Be specific. If you tell the employee, "Do whatever it takes," you may end up with an unpleasant surprise if the employee violates company standards.
- vi) However, a too-limited authority may stop the employee from accomplishing the task. Give the employee the authority necessary to accomplish the task but not so much authority that he or she can create a major disaster before anyone discovers the problem. Also, make clear the budget available and budgetary limitations.
- vii) Be sure the employee understands his or her authority. Again, have the employee repeat back to you his or her understanding of authority regarding the task. Resolve any misunderstandings at the beginning.

---------------------------	--------------------------------	---

viii) Establish a time limit. Time means different thing to different people. If you want the delegated work completed within a certain period, make that clear to the employee. (If you say, "When you get time, work on this," the project may remain untouched for weeks.) Also, if you want portions of the work completed by certain dates, make that clear.

---------------------------	--------------------------------	---

8. AVOIDING PITFALLS

Most entrepreneurs expect their employees to wear many different hats. But some workers lack the versatility to take on different roles in a young company.

Even if they're comfortable taking on a range of duties, they may lack the drive to do what you ask of them. They may take the easy way out, in which they keep coming back and asking you what to do.

Many entrepreneurs fall into the trap by taking the assignment back unwittingly. They might say, "Here, let me show you," and they wind up doing the whole project.

To avoid falling victim to the reverse delegation syndrome, make employees think or problem-solve for themselves. Play the role of coach. Begin by asking the employee various open-ended questions to find out what has already been done and what the person thinks should come next. Offer help and support, but don't take back an assignment that you have delegated to someone else.
