PENERANGAN/INFORMATION:

1 Overview

Staff vertical mobility enhances employee performance and has a positive impact on an organisation's overall effectiveness. Today many organizations are facing difficulty to identify the right candidate eligible for promotion. The cultural shift towards employees' rights, technological advancement, changing workforce and the role of managers, are very much in line with the employee career development. This change suggests a broadened definition of career development from a traditional notion of moving up the ladder toward creating an atmosphere that fosters growth, challenges and job enrichment. Employees must have the ability to manage their own development, and the organisation must provide the resources to facilitate this process.

2 Staff vertical mobility

Vertical mobility refers to the ability for employees to enter at one level and “climb a ladder” of jobs progressively with more responsibility. In general, the potential for vertical mobility within an organisation is to prevent the employees migration.

3 Responsibility of staff vertical mobility

Vertical mobility is the joint responsibility of the employee and the employer. Employees must be motivated to seek out opportunities, prepare formal career development plans, and be willing to work hard to develop their knowledge, skills, and abilities to become competitive in their job functions.

4 Selection criteria to facilitate staff vertical mobility

The vertical mobility will provides employees with information on how to develop their qualifications in order to be competitive in achieving their individual goals. The tools to facilitate vertical mobility for employee in organisation are as follows:

4.1 Action plan

Action plans must be written and outline the actual steps necessary to prepare the employee for further career growth. It must be attainable and measurable as to allow the employee and the organisation to evaluate their progress. It must be specific and contain achievable developmental objectives, as well as the resources necessary to achieve the targets. It must be flexible enough to enable the employee to manage their needs and desires throughout their careers.

A time frame for accomplishing the action plan activities needs to be established and periodic follow-up must be conducted. Continuous monitoring and evaluation are essential, especially in the early part of the employee's career. Jobs may turn out to be something other than expected, or an employee's performance may indicate the need for a change in course. Employee development is multifaceted and must be viewed as a long-term process.

4.2 Participate in promotional examinations

Generally, a promotion is a movement to a higher level classification within the same class series and often requires participation in an examination. Employees may also sign up on a list serve to be notified of upcoming examinations in their organisation. The mode of examination will be set by organisation depending on the nature of work. Commonly, the examination modes include an oral, interview or written examination.

4.3 Proficiency in-service training

Potential staff for promotion should attend all series of trainings. The training benefits the organisation and employees by keeping them up-to-date on duties and responsibilities within present job assignments. It also allows employees the opportunity to maintain those skills and abilities necessary for the job they perform. Proficiency training subjects must consist of those elements of the training program that are indigenous to the organisation and its operations. This type of training is job specific and generally limited to areas that are essential to the overall job function.

In some cases, specialty training is provided by organisation as a platform for employee to enhance knowledge, skills, and abilities necessary to perform jobs beyond the minimum level. It also allows Employees to explore new areas of interest and specialization that will enhance abilities and skills in other specialised jobs. These specialised courses are normally conducted through formal instruction and offered at local institutions of higher education or other designated facilities.

5 Recognition of staff vertical mobilisation

The staff mobility recognition is a part of organisational career advancement, with a specific focus on promotion decisions and their underlying reasons. It contributes to a better understanding of what managers tend to consider in recognizing staff for career mobility when making promotion decisions and evaluating their employees' career prospects.

i) Identify potential staff for vertical mobilisation

Identification of potential staff shall be performed if the staff able to fulfill certain criteria set by the organisation. For example, the staffs have to accomplish their action plan, pass the examination and proficient in a series of specialised training.

ii) Performance appraisal

Performance appraisal also assists management in taking decisions related to employee vertical mobility. For instance, the manager access the staff performance based on the achievement through the agreed Key Performance Indicator.

iii) Evaluation of potential

For jobs with promotion potential, promotions may occur after evaluation of the staff. This evaluation shall cover the criteria whether the staff able to perform at an acceptable level of competence, demonstrate the ability to perform work at the next higher grade level and qualifications with specialised experience.

iv) Identify potential staff for performance reward

The manager shall acknowledge staff for vertical mobilization based on their work contribution and exemplary effort. For example, the manger shall nominate the potential staff for Excellent Workers Award. This may encourage employees to publicly acknowledge and thank their peers for exceptional effort, doing an
