PENERANGAN/ INFORMATION :

1. Positive Attitude Philosophy

1.1 Positive mental attitude (PMA) is the philosophy that having an optimistic disposition in every situation in one's life attracts positive changes and increases achievement. Adherents employ a state of mind that continues to seek, find and execute ways to win, or find a desirable outcome, regardless of the circumstances. It opposes negativity, defeatism and hopelessness. Optimism and hope are vital to the development of PMA

1.2 Change management is attitude. When agencies and companies are experiencing dramatic downsizing and shifting of jobs, planning for change becomes more essential than ever.

1.3 Attitudes are caught, not taught. But how do you prepare work teams for unremitting change that affects their lives?

1.4 Leadership must address the overriding issue of creating a positive attitude about change. Change management is an attitude, and attitudes are caught, not taught. Let's take a look at a case study :

- i) Du Pont recently took a big step in structuring for this attitude of change. Training and Development, published by the American Society of Training and Development (ASTD), reported that Du Pont just moved 300 employees out of private offices into open work stations in its Flouror Productions division. Workers are now working in 8x8 foot, Corian-covered cubicles. Not only do these cubicles promote teamwork, but they result in greater productivity. But the workers weren't happy about the change. So Du Pont flew all of the workers to Grand Rapids Michigan to visit Steelcase, the firm that would be outfitting the new offices. While at Steelcase, Du Pont employees learned a new language:
 - a) Migration – moving from a private office to an individual screened work station

- b) Collaboration zones – meeting rooms
 - c) Docking stations – workbenches
 - d) Free addresses – spaces not assigned to a particular worker
- ii) Du Pont provided an experience. Experience is one step in the process of developing an attitude of change. Other successful attitude building experiences are teambuilding retreats, strategic planning sessions, focus groups, and interactive workshops with senior management in attendance.

1.5 In any case of a change in management or restructuring, one needs to ask him/herself:

- i) What are you doing to develop that attitude of change with your staff?
- ii) What are you doing to help your staff deal with the many changes in their professional and personal lives?

2. Initiative Management Behaviour

2.1 What can the management do in softening the impact of change management? Here are 5 initiatives the management can offer :

- i) Get into the right mindset to be positive
It's a good idea for everyone to start each day with the right attitude. If we look at events in a positive way, we are more able to accept that things happen and so we do not blame others or ourselves for it.

If we can develop a healthy attitude to 'controlling the controllable' during our working day, and in life in general, we are likely to be more resilient if difficult things happen to us. We will not focus on blaming ourselves or others for these tricky situations, but take a more balanced perspective. It also helps if we can understand and develop those factors on which our resilience is based such as self-belief, being able to seek support, adaptability and emotion regulation.

ii) Support employees in becoming more positive

Helping an employee to develop their resilience levels is fundamental when it comes to managing the natural anxiety and uncertainty that are generated by certain events. This includes accepting that success will not be possible all of the time.

When staff feel that negative thoughts are building up as a result of a disappointment or frustration, it is important for them to realise that they are in a bad emotional place and understand that it will not help them to resolve the problem.

But they also require some form of coping mechanism. While this might involve seeking support from others, there are also opportunities for individuals to change the way that they think about problems and obstacles in order to approach them from a more positive perspective.

iii) Introduce a mentoring scheme to help staff behave more positively

When individuals are engaged in activities that they enjoy and can focus their skills and energies effectively, they tend to be more successful, have lower incidences of stress and experience a greater sense of well-being.

However, there are a lot of pressures at work to distract staff from playing to their strengths. Discipline and assertiveness are needed to do so and to encourage them to enlist the help of others in areas where they are less strong.

As a result, it can prove beneficial for individuals to work with other team members in reflecting on and evaluating their personal strengths. To help with this, you could introduce a mentoring scheme. After all, no effective sporting star or team would be without a coach today.

iv) Encourage workers to record their achievements

It's important to introduce practical, achievable steps that don't take too much time in order to help improve employees' personal and/or professional development. This ranges from assisting them in gaining qualifications to assuming a new role or finding a better work-life balance.

Having a direction and purpose helps to keep people focused when times are tough, so that they are able to place difficulties and challenges into the broader context of achieving their goals.

To this end, encourage staff to record achievements and share their goals with others in order to reinforce their commitment. It may be useful for them to keep a personal diary and to write in it for a few minutes each day, noting down any successes or setbacks that they have experienced.

v) Encourage employees to give something back

As human beings, we value the collaboration and support of others – no person is an island. Similarly, we also like to give something back. A lot of people who have shown single-mindedness in getting to the top of their career, vocation or sport, try to put something back in their own professional area.

For instance, we have seen entrepreneurs such as Bill Gates establish a global aid foundation, while the likes of Alan Sugar helps young entrepreneurs to take their first step.

It's important to help staff realise that, not only can they turn to others for support, but they can also help them too. Even new starters can bring fresh ideas to the team and, if employees see that they can give something back, it boosts their own self-esteem.

3. Mitigation And Adaptation Procedures

3.1 Every company has to undergo constant changes in procedures and basic structural set-ups in order to thrive and cope with the changing conditions. Sometimes, employees may be resistant to this change because it might affect their routine or make them feel threatened. Simple changes like changing office premises or serious ones like changing the organisational structure may affect anyone's mindset.

3.2 However, the key to coping lies in the managers' behaviour and ability to handle the staff. It is most important for the managers to handle the entire change, whatever it may be with a positive attitude. Here's how.

i) To act as a support to the staff

Any subordinate staff will look to their manager as a lead and guide in time of crisis or change. It is important to know how to handle the change positively so that the staff can tide over it without any inhibitions. If the manager himself starts acting uncertainly and behaving irrationally it might affect the entire workflow and even the mindset of the staff. Change training is an important element in the larger scheme of things.

iii) To help make employees understand

When you start making changes within any corporate structure, employees need time to adjust too. Initially, when you start introducing change, employees may fear it, they may not welcome it. As a manager, it is your positive outlook that will help make them understand how the change is important and how it will benefit the organisation as a whole.

A positive talk will additionally help them put the company goals above their own, thereby helping to adjust to the new points or changes.

iv) To make them comfortable

If you go about leading the way to a new set-up or structure with no proper counselling or positivity, employees may get uncomfortable; rumours may start spreading about the instability within the organisation, even if there isn't any.

It is your responsibility to make the staff comfortable during the transition and to help them cope. It is normal for employees to get used to a certain structure and new employees, a new work set-up or even changes in the work flow may severely affect them.

- v) To make the transition smooth
Transition takes time and if it is not handled properly, it might lead to trouble. The staff at any organisation might not be able to learn the new changes adapt to it or work properly and effectively. While change may be relevant and even necessary in some cases, it is the smooth transitioning that will help the employees move forward. This is where your counselling and positive attitude will help most.
- vi) To save time in adapting
Without the right attitude and level of positivity or counselling, employees will take more time adapting to the change. It might affect their ability to adapt and take longer for the organisation to start working as per the new structure. It is the responsibility of the managers to ensure this doesn't happen with the right attitude and lots of positivity.

4. Identification Of Instruction Problems Concerning Work Completion

- 4.1 Upon completing all the steps above, a good manager will have a bigger picture of how the staff are coping, the potential problems, possible potential candidate for upgrading, potential areas to improve, create a better relationship within the organization, possible solutions to problems and other views that was not apparent before
- 4.2 After gathering the information, the manager could assess the impact of the change management as to the work output and how it could affect the work completion.

- 4.3 This leads to a fairer, easier assessments of potential problems that could result in low work completion thus giving management the chance to plan ahead to overcome the problems
