PENERANGAN/ INFORMATION :

1. Counseling, Coaching And Mentoring During Change Management

1.1 What is counselling?

- i) Defined as discussion of an emotional problem with an employee, with the general objective of decreasing it. Therefore, counseling:
 - a) Deals with an emotional problem.
 - b) Is an act of communication.
 - c) Is generally to understand and/or decrease an employee's emotional disorder
 - d) Can be done by both, the managers and the professionally trained counselors.

- ii) Counseling is warranted when one notices an inability to cope with the environment, in this case; Change in Management. This inability manifests in behaviour disorder which in turn does lead to harm to self, the organization and others working therein. Feelings can not be ignored. They are facts and more so to the individual concerned. Managers desire the employees to maintain a reasonable emotional equilibrium and to channelize the emotions to constructive activities.

- iii) Any condition, on or off the job, may need counseling. These conditions can be from:
 - a) Job dissatisfaction,
 - b) Resistance to change, or,
 - c) Alienation, Disorientation etc.

- iv) Other major conditions that must be clearly understood are:
 - a) Frustrations,
 - b) Conflicts, or,
 - c) Stress.

- v) Frustration occurs when the motivation is blocked preventing one from reaching the desired goal. Frustration can be short term-event related or long term-aspiration related. The longer the frustration, the greater the problem. Frustration usually is reacted to in any of the following ways.
 - a) Aggression,
 - b) Apathy,
 - c) Withdrawal,
 - d) Regression,
 - e) Fixation,
 - f) Physical disorders, or,
 - g) Substituted goals.

- vi) Counseling can help reduce frustration, by helping the employees to choose a mature course of action to remove blockages preventing goal accomplishment, or by helping them to reconcile with the reality. Counselors will have to work with both, the employee and the Management.

- vii) Conflicts: Both the interpersonal and inter-group conflicts may cause emotional disorders. When people of different backgrounds, points of view, values, needs and personalities interact a variety of conflicts may arise.

- vii) Conflicts are not always bad. Ideally, while handling conflicts, try to reduce the disadvantages and to increase the benefits. Conflicts stimulate people to look for better approaches for improved results. Often, hidden problems surface and a deeper understanding may develop.

- x) On the other hand, cooperation and teamwork may suffer, distrust may grow, and the loser may attempt continuance of the conflicts to settle the score. The organization's basic goal is to move the conflicts into a win-win possibility, so that no one feels lost and in fact all feel having won.

- xi) Counseling assists conflict resolution by reducing emotional blockages.
- xii) Counseling objectives are achieved through performing one of the following counseling functions:
 - a) Advise.
 - b) Reassure,
 - c) Communicate,
 - d) Release of emotional tensions,
 - e) Clarified thinking, and,
 - f) Reorientation.
- xiii) Who should do the counseling? Normally it's the job of the direct superior e.g. supervisors, managers or anyone superior in hierarchy but professional help is sometimes sought i.e. consultants or professional counselor
- xii) Who ever becomes the counselor, he/she must meet these conditions in the counseling relationship :
 - a) Counselee should psychologically accept the counselor.
 - b) Counselor must be able to listen well and communicate effectively.
 - c) An atmosphere of trust and confidence.
 - d) Credibility & Sensitivity of the counselor.

1.2 What is coaching?

- i) It is defined as a method of directing, instructing and training a person or group of people, with the aim to achieve some goal or develop specific skills. There are many ways to coach, types of coaching and methods to coaching. Direction may include motivational speaking and training may include seminars, workshops, and supervised practice
- ii) The benefits of coaching is that the individual will be able to improve their work performance and skill set by receiving one-on-one training to develop career prospects.
- iii) The majority of coaching is generally delivered within an organisation by an immediate supervisor or manager. However, many organisations these days employ professional external coaches to come into their organisation to provide this service. Coaches should be willing to listen, observe and support the coachee's ability, knowledge and resourcefulness.

- iv) External coaches are trained to deliver specific individual coaching sessions to meet the individual needs, following the methods of setting clear standards, goals, use of learning, feedback and evaluation.

1.3 Differences between Coaching and Mentoring?

The differences between coaching and mentoring are quite clear:

i) Coaching

Generally follows the format of individual guidance that is focused on job performance and aimed at one person alone. The coach specifically advises the person on how to tackle and perform a particular task, they provide constructive feedback and delegate further similar tasks, setting goals or higher-level tasks for the individual to complete. The coach in most instances will be an immediate supervisor or manager who will have overall responsibility for the department's overall performance. Coaching is about having a positive relationship where the coachee respects, trusts and identifies with the coach.

ii) Mentoring

Generally follows the format of generalised advice and guidance of career development. Mentoring is about developing a relationship between a more senior and experienced mentor and an inexperienced mentee to guide and develop the mentee's knowledge and career progression. The mentor generally will be someone who is not your immediate supervisor/manager or within your organisation can allow the luxury of talking to an independent impartial confidante who is not your manager, they will have the ability to listen to your issues, afford you the opportunity to vent unrestrictedly and support and assist you in achieving your goals.

However saying this, some organisations who offer mentoring for their employees may allocate a mentor within the organisation who has similar standing, status and power as your immediate supervisor.

1.4 Why is coaching important during change management ?

- i) To understand when a coaching approach will be appropriate and effective.
- ii) To create the right environment for effective coaching – based on trust and credibility.
- iii) To work collaboratively through building rapport and communicating effectively.
- iv) To understand organisational constraints and how to manage these to develop a culture of coaching.
- v) To understand the relationship between your natural leadership style and effective coaching.
- vi) To set measurable objectives and link to the GROW model to offer a rounded approach to coaching.
- vii) To recognise the importance of role modelling, and great communication skills.
- viii) To deliver feedback to improve performance even when the going gets tough.
